

Overview

The Match Resource reflects a scheduled football game. A game belongs to a competition and a season. It owns a stage and is typically played on a certain matchday. As mentioned in the introducing chapters the latter two are only attributes of a match, whereas competition and season are annotated object-like.

If you need detailed information about former encounters between the teams, you can call the Head2head Subresource by appending `/head2head` to the URI.

The list resource appears as subresource for the Competition, Team and Person Resource.

Let's see the entire beauty of the Match Resource underneath.

Status workflow explained

The status field indicates the current phase a match is in. For the majority this is FINISHED (96,9% of all matches in my database contain that status) but how do matches get there? Lets try to depict that with a diagram. The slightly greenish boxes show the "happy flow".

As soon as a match finds it's way to the database and given there is a rough date set, it is stamped with status `SCHEDULED`. As soon the date is finalised with an exact date and time, the match enters status `TIMED`. It gets played (`IN_PLAY`), the players rest (`PAUSED`) and the final whistle pushes the match to `FINISHED`.

The grey box shows the 'pseudo-status' `LIVE`, that you can use as a match filter. It's just for convenience, so in the end it combines status `IN_PLAY` and `PAUSED` (and the backend does exactly that if you pass `LIVE` as value for status).

Last but not least not all the time everything goes well, but I won't go into detail here as I think everything is quite clear within the diagram.

Enums

Some fields contain values that are defined by an Enum, which is useful to reveal, so here we go:
